Fresh peaches

Pat Patten

Follow this and additional works at: https://dsc.duq.edu/spiritan-tc

Recommended Citation

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Spiritan Collection at Duquesne Scholarship Collection. It has been accepted for inclusion in Spiritan Magazine by an authorized editor of Duquesne Scholarship Collection.
Ndepayan’s husband was killed while working as night watchman in Nairobi several years ago. His death left her destitute and alone in raising three kids, two of whom have major health problems. She hardly had money to feed herself, let alone her three young children, and she had absolutely no money for health care. In her desperation she did the only thing she could think of: she hid the sick ones away.

I don’t remember how she found us. One day they were just here. She and her children, all in tattered clothes, just showed up at our door. The 11-year-old, Naramat, her oldest child, helped her carry Losieku, the youngest of the three. This small boy was born with spina bifida, a horrible birth defect that leaves the spinal cord uncovered. Tagging along behind, her second child, Loewuo, was drooling from the side of his mouth. Apparently born healthy, early on he started having severe and prolonged seizures, sometimes three in one day. Now his blank expressionless face held the look of a child who had suffered from years of serious epilepsy.

She wanted her children well
She said, “I heard that you can sometimes help people.” I said, “Yes, sometimes we can.” She didn’t ask for money, clothes or food. She wanted her children well. These two sick children, Loewuo with the seizures, Losieku with the spina bifida, were far too ill for us to treat at our small dispensary. But by chance, late the following morning, the aircraft would be flying empty to one of the only two hospitals in Tanzania with a neurosurgeon. I asked her to be here early and told her it would not cost her anything. The expenses of the one-hour flight were already covered by the hospital which needed the plane’s services later in the day.

Three hours late
She arrived here three hours after the plane had left.
Although I shouldn’t have been upset, I was frustrated with her for losing such a good chance. She let me tell her how disappointed I was. Then she simply said, “I’m sorry” and started to walk away. I followed her.

I wanted to know why she would waste such an opportunity. She answered quietly, “We live high up the mountain. I was awake before dawn trying to get the children ready. Then we started walking at the first light of day. But Loewuo had a seizure and we had to wait for him. Then he was so tired and weak that he could only walk short distances before resting. I had to help him stand up and push him forward to start him walking again. Although I saw we would be late, I so badly wanted the children to be treated that I continued on, thinking perhaps the plane would still be here.”

On time two weeks later
Even though she had missed that flight, two weeks later the plane was making another trip to the same hospital and the visiting neurosurgeon was still there. This time, leaving the 11-year-old daughter at home to take care of the cow and the goats, Ndepayan and her two sick children didn’t miss the flight.

That was four weeks ago and today they are back. Loewuo’s suspected epilepsy was not epilepsy but a rarer disease of the mitochondria in the cells. Even in Europe or America the prognosis is bad; but high-line anti-epileptic drugs do reduce his seizures. Losieku’s spina bifida is skillfully closed up and he is growing so fast that in a short time his mother will not be able to carry him. We’ll have a physiotherapist and an orthopedic specialist work with him; and with their help he will soon take his first step. We believe that with the aid of crutches he will be able to walk alone.

Ndepayan brought me some fresh peaches from her tree.